CHAPTER XVI WE LEAVE GLAWI The morning we left the Kalifa came and toyed with an orange-sprig while I was having my breakfast alone, the others having finished. He wishes to present me with a flower, I am sure, I thought, and not knowing how else to help him, being ignorant of more than a few words of his language, I merely smiled at him encouragingly. He smiled back, it is true, but shifted his feet uneasily and looked anxiously towards the entrance. This went on for some time, and the situation was becoming strained. One reads of situations getting into this condition, and I now realised what it meant. However, the denodment was at hand: the high official appeared, and with him a slave carrying--bearing I should say--a rug. This was placed at my feet, for the Senora I was told. And...
